Excerpt: .time for my birdlings to go to their nests, said Violet, rising and taking Iled s hand. Bid good-night to papa and the rest and we will go. CHAPTER XIII WoULn you enjoy a little stroll about the grounds before seeking your nest for the night, dearest? asked Harold of Grace, speaking so softly that the words reached no ear but hers. I think I should--with pleasant company, she added, a twinkle of fun in her eyes as she lifted them to his, so full of love and admiration. He who gives the invitation will do his best to be that, he returned, offering his arm as they both rose to their feet. A few minutes later they were seated in the arbor on the edge of the cliff overlooking the river--the very place where he had first told the story of his love and she had acknowledged its return. Both remembered that now, and the pleasant story was told again. A little silence followed, broken presently by Grace. What a lovely scene this is! What a grand old river! I am always sorry to leave it, though glad, too, to go home to our own place in the sunny south. Yes; a winter here would be too, cold for my frail patient, said Harold, pressing affectionately the small white hand he held in his. For which reason, as well as others, I am glad we have homes in the sunny south. I only...
