Not illustrated. 1811 Excerpt: . . . the second, the remaining indications are so imperfect, that I have not attempted to conjecture, or even ventured to insert them. In all the specimens of final inscriptions, which are given in pages 37, and 38, I have designedly exhibited all the vowels, except H, as of a size really less than in the original manuscripts. I thought that I could thus distinguish them better from the consonants, which are all, invariably, capitals. In the greatest part of the original manuscripts, as may be seen by the fac simile copies, the vowels, as they are not capitals, rise not to the height of the consonants, except in Philodemus. In the greatest part of his manuscripts all the vowels rise to the height of the consonants. Hence his omicron appears to be a capital. The dialect of the fragments of the eight books of Epicurus is...
