It would seem, therefore, that this genus, evolving from a Silurian form like Sagenocrinus or Temnocrinus, underwent its final transformation in the Burlington limestone by taking on an additional primary plate in each ray; and that this was accomplished by a specific change far more complete and decisive than we find in some other cases where the modification was going on in the Devonian. Doubtless if we had all the stages of this development through the Devonian we should see phases of individual variation; but the final stage became firmly established in the genus, with one species tenaciously holding on to its Silurian type of ray structure. It is singular that with this apparently straight line of derivation, no trace of this type has been found in the prolific crinoidal deposits of the Lower Burlington beds at the same locality. We must remember, however, in...
